Priestley begins by arguing that time is not a fixed and immutable entity, but rather a subjective experience that is shaped by our own minds. He points to the fact that we can remember the past, imagine the future, and even experience time differently in different states of consciousness. This suggests that time is not something that exists independently of us, but rather something that we create and experience for ourselves.

Priestley then goes on to explore the relationship between time and consciousness. He argues that our experience of time is intimately connected to our state of mind. When we are focused on the present moment, time seems to slow down. When we are lost in thought, time seems to speed up. This suggests that our experience of time is not simply a reflection of the external world, but is also shaped by our own internal state.

Priestley's book is a wide-ranging and thought-provoking exploration of the nature of time and consciousness. It is a must-read for anyone interested in these topics, and it is sure to change the way you think about the world.
