The magazine was founded by Fletcher Harper, Jr., the son of Fletcher Harper, Sr., one of the founders of Harper & Brothers, the publishing house that produced Harper's Young People. The magazine's first editor was William Cullen Bryant, the poet and editor of the New York Evening Post. Bryant served as editor until his death in 1878, when he was succeeded by Edward Eggleston, the author of The Hoosier Schoolmaster.

Harper's Young People was a large magazine, with each issue running to 16 pages. The magazine was printed on high-quality paper and featured numerous illustrations, both black-and-white and color. The magazine's cover was typically illustrated by one of the most famous artists of the day, such as Thomas Nast or Winslow Homer.

The magazine's content was varied and appealed to a wide range of readers. The magazine featured stories by some of the most popular children's authors of the day, such as Louisa May Alcott, Mark Twain, and Frances Hodgson Burnett. The magazine also featured poems by some of the most famous poets of the day, such as Emily Dickinson and Robert Louis Stevenson.

In addition to stories and poems, Harper's Young People also featured articles on a wide range of topics, including history, science, and geography. The magazine also featured puzzles, games, and other activities for children.

Harper's Young People was a popular and influential publication. The magazine helped to shape the childhood of many young Americans. The magazine is still read today by children and adults alike, and it remains a valuable resource for researchers interested in the history of children's literature.
