The Campaign

The American campaign to liberate the Philippines began on October 20, 1944, with the landings on Leyte. The landings were successful, and the Americans quickly established a beachhead on the island. However, the Japanese fought back fiercely, and the Americans faced heavy resistance as they moved inland.

The Americans slowly pushed the Japanese back, and by early 1945 they had liberated most of Leyte. However, the Japanese still held out in the mountains, and the Americans continued to face heavy resistance.

In February 1945, the Americans launched an amphibious assault on Luzon, the largest island in the Philippines. The landings were successful, and the Americans quickly established a beachhead on the island. However, the Japanese again fought back fiercely, and the Americans faced heavy resistance as they moved inland.

On August 15, 1945, Japan surrendered, and the war in the Philippines came to an end. The Americans had succeeded in liberating the Philippines from Japanese occupation, but at a great cost.

The Personal Accounts

The Liberation of the Philippines includes personal accounts from soldiers and civilians who witnessed the war firsthand. These accounts provide a unique perspective on the war, and they help to bring the history to life.

One of the most moving accounts is from a young Filipino woman who was forced to work as a comfort woman for the Japanese. She describes the horrors she endured, and her account is a powerful reminder of the suffering that the Filipino people endured during the war.

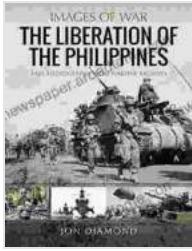

Another account is from an American soldier who fought in the Battle of Leyte. He describes the fierce fighting, and he also talks about the camaraderie that he shared with his fellow soldiers. His account is a testament to the courage and sacrifice of the American soldiers who fought in the war.
